“No More Wags”

A Song of Love, Loss, and Healing

When Kim Kushner first held Goldie, a Golden Doodle pup with a gentle heart, she had no idea just how much joy this little dog would bring to the world. At just ten weeks old, Goldie seemed destined for more than a simple life at home. Her calm and tender spirit made her the perfect therapy dog, and soon she was visiting nursing homes, senior centers, and children with special needs. Goldie had a gift—she could sense when someone needed comfort. She even received special permission to hop into bed with nursing home residents, nestling against them as if to say, you’re not alone.

For fifteen years, Goldie gave that kind of love without limits. To Kim, she wasn’t just a pet. She was family, a confidant, and a companion through every season of life. Then came the day no dog lover ever wants to face. Goldie’s health began to fade, and Kim had to make the most heartbreaking decision of her life—to let her beloved friend go. “The day I put her down was the worst day of my life,” Kim recalls. The silence in the house was deafening. No paws on the floor. No eager eyes watching her every move. No happy wagging tail to greet her at the door. There would be, as Kim so poignantly put it, no more wags.

The next morning, still raw with grief, Kim picked up her guitar. The emotions spilled out faster than she could catch them, and within twenty minutes, the song No More Wags was written. It was a love letter to Goldie, but also a reminder of the unbreakable bond between people and the animals who love them so completely.

For anyone who has ever lost a four-legged best friend, Kim’s song is more than music—it’s a hand to hold. It’s proof that grief can give way to beauty, and that love doesn’t end when life does. The wags may stop, but the love never will. We can open our hearts and love again.
